

GA Meth Project is working

Reported by: Jessica Kiss

Email: jkiss@thecoastalsource.com

Published: 6/15 8:28 am

(Savannah, Ga.)- Authorities say teenagers are less likely to try meth and are more aware of the dangers of meth due to the shocking TV ads put together by the campaign.

A new survey shows 52 percent of Georgia teenagers now see great risk in trying meth and up to 80 percent say the ads make them less likely to try it.

The powerful television ads started running last year. The latest group of ads were revealed Tuesday and will start airing in the fall.

"We're not trying to shock people. We're trying to show kids particularly what are the risks; what are the real things that are going to happen to you on meth," said Jim Langford, "Meth Project" program director.

"None of the ads are over the top in that sense," he told The Coastal Source.

Copyright 2011 The Coastal Source